For years, Apex Travel offered free weekends breaks to people on their mailing list. The idea was that customers would later book a complete holiday with Apex. However, after two years, Apex found that people were getting the benefit of the free holidays but not buying holidays at the full price later. Apex dealt with the situation by cutting their mailing list, thus reducing their “bad, non-spending customers by 22%. As a result, Apex were able to focus on their good customers.

Companies must avoid bad customers because they use up resources that can be spent on good customers. Furthermore, bad customers are likely to upset even the most patient staff members by complaining frequently. A bad customer is likely to have come to you through a special offer, discount, or other inexpensive way of getting your product.

In the end, they show poor customer loyalty, often switching companies.

Companies need to look after the good customers. Remember, these are the customers who will buy from you again and again. So, is the customer always right? The majority are most of the time.
